Dr Michael Walker of the Fraser Institute has been an intellectual pioneer of the project on objective measurement of economic freedom. I first joined his efforts at the 1996 Economic Freedom of the World Symposium in San Francisco. Since then the interactions at such meetings with him and authors James Gwartney and Robert Lawson have been tremendously enriching. I am grateful for their leadership, constant support, and the permission to reprint the 2004 Annual Report.

The Friedrich Naumann Foundation initiated a gathering in 1999 of people from Asia to discuss, understand, and apply the Economic Freedom of the World Index to their home countries. The annual meetings of the Asian Economic Freedom Network have encouraged many to examine the importance of economic freedom. It has led to the design of economic freedom index for the provinces of China and the states of India.

The John Templeton Foundation and the Friedrich Naumann Foundation have very generously supported the publication of this volume by the Centre for Civil Society. Their support has been invaluable in making possible this expanded reprint with a software CD.

Ms H B Soumya, one of my indefatigable research associates at CCS, has put in long hours on a short notice to help prepare new materials for this volume. Sanu and Rituraj Kapila of the Academic Foundation have worked diligently against a tight deadline to produce this exquisite India reprint along with the very helpful software. Neil Emerick has designed a wonderfully productive software to explore the varied relationships between economic freedom and many other values that we cherish. His generous discount on the purchase of the software is deeply appreciated. May be he has a real soft corner for India since he proposed to Theresa at Taj Mahal after the Asian Economic Freedom Network meeting in Jaipur in 2003!

The spontaneous order in the marketplace of ideas, promises, services, and goods does indeed work! Three cheers for the freedoms we enjoy to create and exchange our values nationally and internationally.
